BOOK IN PROGRESS

Wordsworth's Mother Tongue: Scholars of Romanticism typically stress Wordsworth's individuation from a mother figure as it influences his imagination and poetic identity, but I argue that Wordsworth's identification with mothers is also significant for understanding his poetic practice. In fact, in early versions of his works, he explicitly acknowledges the importance of balancing identification and individuation in the maternal relationship for developing a poetic imagination; however, in later revisions and work, he anxiously represses and obscures the significance of mother figures and instead foregrounds a more general dynamic of identification and individuation. Understanding the development of these mental processes in the context of maternal relationships helps readers follow Wordsworth's development as a poet and comprehend his comment in The Prelude that a poet/child's mind functions as "creator and receiver both."
